Field of the Invention The invention relates generally to water bottles for carrying liquid during exercise, such as soft drinks, sports drinks and the like. More particularly, the invention relates to a water bottle having a replaceable bag-in-a-bottle integrally molded with the bottle so that the bottle is a one-piece, self-contained unit that can be carried in a variety of ways. The bag-in-a-bottle can also be used as a personal hygiene pouch, for carrying moist towelettes, paper towels, a tooth brush and so forth. 2. Description of the Prior Art During exercise, such as jogging or bicycling, it is often desirable to carry a personal supply of liquid. Typically, the liquid is carried in a bottle having a squeeze-type closure. The bottle is arranged in a holder, usually a holder of the type including an outer cylindrical collar and an inner, central, flat support disc. The bottle has a neck formed around a mouth that is open at the top. The bottle neck is arranged in the central hole of the disc and a resilient annular band formed around the neck is forced against the disc to close the hole in the disc and to secure the bottle in the holder. Although these bottle holders are very convenient, they have several drawbacks. First, the bottles must be kept upright in the holder or they will spill. To keep the bottles in the upright position, the bottles must either be placed in the holder with the neck of the bottle above the bottom of the bottle or the bottle must be inverted when placed in the holder. In either case, the bottle must be removed from the holder before the bottle is inverted and placed in the inverted position in the holder. Furthermore, when the bottle is dropped, the resilient band around the neck of the bottle provides a cushion and the impact of the dropping bottle may not be felt by the person carrying the bottle. Often the bottle and holder must be carried with the bottle positioned for easy access by the user, especially during intense exercise. The bottle is simply removed from the holder, either by sliding or by rotating the
