Codon usage in phage T4 glnA and glnA genes: evidence for increasing asymmetry with increasing genetic distance to the glnA translational start site. The full codon usage of the T4 glnA gene, encoding glutamine synthetase, was determined. It was found that, although the codon usage of the glnA gene is biased toward adenine and thymine, the codons used with each of these nucleotides are essentially independent. The codon usage became increasingly asymmetric toward adenine and thymine and toward the end of the polypeptide, which increased in direct proportion to the distance between the glnA translational start site and the 5' end of the glnA gene, to the extent that the codon usage of the glnA translation start codon is now symmetrical. This finding suggests a model of codon usage in which the stop codons and the translation start site represent the limiting extreme ends of a distribution of codon usage frequencies and where further within-gene codon usage is dominated by position-dependent asymmetry in favor of certain nucleotides.
