antispyware programs. It's classified in the Trojan category and is distributed via fake codec downloads. Here's the most common scenario that leads to installing this spyware: you're watching a movie and all of a sudden, you receive a warning that you're missing a video codec that is needed in order to play that specific media file. If you accept to download such items, SmitFraud is installed silently on the system. Once residing on your computer, the Trojan starts displaying messages that the computer is infected and as such, provides links to antispyware software. Not only are these applications rogue and totally inefficient, but you are also asked to pay for them, when, in reality, the only infection is actually SmitFraud. One solution for this problem is SmitfraudFix. It's command-line based and it doesn't need installation, nor is it complicated to use. The steps you need to take in order to clean your computer are described in the application's main window: first off, you can perform a scan via the Search function, while the cleaning part of the whole process can undergo only in Safe Mode. In some cases, a reboot is required in order for your computer to be completely healed. All in all, SmitfraudFix appears to be a decent spyware removal solution. It may not have the prettiest interface of all, but it performs the job in an acceptable amount of time. I'm back with another video showing all the newest additions in all of my main programs. This image was removed due to legal reasons. Maybe it's not just the United States that is reeling in the wake of hurricane Irma's destructive assault. The Guardian has reported on the storm-relief efforts in South Florida in which a team of three survivors of the storm actually arrived at their own home unannounced and filmed the house as it was, with a view to showing exactly what Florida officials had been working to show: the damage wrought by Irma was due to a "misreading" of data. This image was removed due to legal reasons. This image was removed due to legal reasons. This image was removed due to legal reasons. This image was removed due to legal reasons. The work, which began after the three survivors first suffered through the storm themselves, was finished by an engineer, who put it together with the help of two local students, ages 12 and 15. And like much of the coverage of Irma's effects around the world, it's a kind of reminder of the challenges posed by covering stories about extreme weather events. It's the kind of concise, hopeful look at how well government and other NGOs work to repair communities and homes in the aftermath of disasters that global media outlets love to highlight. But this is
